

The Business Builders Secrets

Legal Stuff

The Publisher has strived to be as accurate and complete as possible in the creation of this report, notwithstanding the fact that he does not warrant or represent at any time that the contents within are accurate due to the rapidly changing nature of the Internet. While all attempts have been made to verify information provided in this report, the Publisher assumes no responsibility for errors, omissions, or contrary interpretation of the subject matter herein. Any perceived slights of specific persons, peoples, or organizations are unintentional.

Disclaimers

Information contained within this document is for educational purposes only. Every attempt has been made to provide accurate, up to date and reliable complete information. No warranties of any kind are expressed or implied. Readers acknowledge that the author is not engaging in rendering legal, financial or professional advice.

By reading this document, the reader agrees that under no circumstances are we responsible for any losses, direct or indirect, that are incurred as a result of use of the information contained within this document, including but not limited to errors, omissions, or inaccuracies.

Copyright Information

© Copyright 2015 Augustine Business Solutions. <http://www.augenterprise.com>
All rights reserved.

You are encouraged to print this book for easy reading.

Table of Contents

Introduction	4
The Marketing Funnel Explained	5
Product Pitcher Versus A Real Business Builder	7
The 80/20 Rule	9
What Is The Marketing Funnel?	12

Introduction

Most people when they think of creating a business online, they think of creating a product, selling the product, and hope to make enough money. This kind of thinking is short-term, and doesn't lend itself well to a long-term business expansion.

When you stop and think about a longer-term business model, whether online, off-line, or a mix of the two, you really need to think bigger.

What's really needed is a method to capture leads, convert those leads into customers, and gradually build them into customers that visit your site or buy your products on a regular basis.

So how do you turn a single product or product mentality into a thriving long-term business? Well, to begin with, you need to have a viable business model. And part of that business model absolutely must include the "marketing funnel."

The Marketing Funnel Explained

The marketing funnel is a tool, or a process, to separate your prospects and customers into different groups.

For example we want to know the difference between our leads – customers who hardly spend any money with us – and customers who return to our website or store regularly, and customers that spend more money with us on a regular basis. This allows us to concentrate our efforts on the smallest group of customers that spend the most amount of money with us. In other words, we're trying to maximize our return on investment.

We will now take a closer look at the marketing funnel to see how it works, plus the "80/20 rule" which you are probably familiar with. These two systems together has the capacity to drive return of those customers who spend the most money with us, those customers that spend the least, and the freebie seekers and tire-kickers. Most marketers are missing at least one or two of these crucial groups causing them to leave wads of money on the table that could otherwise be in their pockets.

The REAL Business-BUILDER's Way Of Obtaining Maximum Profits

A typical business model might focus on three areas for each transaction:

1. You can acquire more customers, which is what most businesses try to do.
2. You can get them to spend more with you per each transaction (monetary value).
3. And you can get them to buy from you more often (frequency).

[There are other ways of growing a business like dealing with investments and such, but for the sake of this discussion, we will keep it simple and refer to growing your business as building a strong customer base].

So the goal, then, becomes how do we do any of those three things. Ideally, we would like to do all three.

When you think in terms of a product, you're talking about a single instance of something that can be leveraged into greater assets over the long run through the use of this rather simple model.

Using the fast food business model as an example, when we talk about a cross-sell, that's similar to when you order a sandwich and they ask you, "Do you want fries with that?" When we use the term, "upsell," it's similar to that fast food joint asking you, "Do you want to supersize that?"

Now you may already know this information. But we have to start with a frame of reference.

The real money to be made is on what we call the "back end."

For example, if you order something from a catalog, perhaps even a small "impulse buy" item, and they later send you information to get you to purchase a more expensive item, that's what we call "selling on the back-end." It's where the business is truly grown.

Many times a company will actually lose money on the front-end sale, so that they can profit on the back end sale. This is called a "loss leader." It's what separates the one-off small-time single product companies from the big boys that are in it for the long haul. And if you have any long-term ambitions for your business, that's the line of thinking you need to be taking.

Think of the Amazon Fire tablets ranked "Highest in Customer Satisfaction with Tablets" according to the J.D. Power 2014 U.S. Tablet Satisfaction Study. Why? Because it has HD display with fast quad-core processor, front and rear cameras, Dolby Audio, and multiple color choices, free unlimited cloud storage and has over 33 million apps, games, songs, movies, TV shows, books and more... and the price starts at $99 in 2015. That is a lot of bang for your bucks. For Amazon, the real money is not in the tablets sales but in all those apps and multiple downloads of games, songs, movies, TV shows and books from every single tablet purchased.

Single one-off sales rarely sustain a business for very long. Not only that, the profits they produce are minuscule in comparison with those companies that have a larger vision.

Let's take a closer look at why these methods are so successful, and the type of customer you really want to focus on to drive your business into the stratosphere.

Product Pitcher Vs. Business Builder

What separates the “product pitchers” from the “business-builders?”

A product pitcher thinks about what's hot for the next few months, and concentrates on selling a product or service to fill that hot, but limited need.

A business-builder thinks in longer terms and sells products and services that can be leveraged in the future as the situation arises.

A business-builder thinks in terms of what will increase their wealth over a longer period of time. That is, how to build a business in the long run, regardless of what's currently hot at the moment.

That's not to say that a business-builder will disregard what's considered hot at the moment. Rather it means they capitalize on that trend, but also think about how it will morph into something else that they can be prepared to provide.

A product pitcher has to constantly reinvent itself to stay on top of current trend. Not only that, the challenges get greater as time goes on, and the amount of work needed to sustain the business become practically impossible to maintain over the long haul.

Also, once the initial fuss over the product pitcher's product has died down, there's a severe decline in profits as traffic and sales eventually slow to a trickle.

On the other hand, a true business-builder will always see a constant flow of sales, and will look for ways to maximize revenue continuously for the long haul.

Are you starting to see a pattern here?

The real business-builder is in the business of creating and growing a long-term company that will survive good times and bad.

The product pitcher, on the other hand, will chase one hot trend after another until all ideas are exhausted.

Over time, which category would you like to be in? For me the answer is obvious.

I'd rather build a solid business foundation that'll stand the test of time, even though it may be less sensational than the short-term one-hit wonders that a product pitcher will produce.

To be frank, it is certainly possible to do both. You can be a product pitcher in a different capacity, while at the same time maintain a solid business separately under another capacity. It really comes down to what your goals are.

But think about this: if you were to become a product pitcher, it's going to require a constant pulse on your market(s), a lot more work than you think it might be, but the upside is you may occasionally obtain short-term, but sometimes huge, paydays.

A true business-building model, on the other hand, allows you the freedom to run your business as you see fit, producing true constant income streams, and it doesn't always require you to think of that next best hottest thing.

I'm not telling you to go one way or the other. It really comes down to what your goals are, as well as your own personality and what you enjoy doing.

The 80/20 Rule

In 1895, Italian economist Vilfredo Pareto wrote about a mathematical formula he discovered modeling the distribution of wealth in several countries he studied. Pareto observed that twenty percent of the population owned eighty percent of the land. Eventually others found similar distributions that applied to their own situations. Dr. Joseph Juran, a quality management expert working in the US in the 1930s and 40s recognized a universal principle he dubbed the "vital few and trivial many."

As a result, Juran's observation that 20 percent of something is responsible for 80 percent of the results became known as Pareto's Principle, or the 80/20 Rule.

The 80/20 Rule simply means that in any situation, a few (20 percent) are vital, and many (80 percent) are trivial. Put another way, the 80/20 rule states that the relationship between input and output is rarely, if ever, balanced. In Pareto's case it meant 20 percent of the people owned 80 percent of the wealth. In Juran's case he discovered that 20 percent of manufacturing defects were causing 80 percent of all problems. You can apply the 80/20 Rule to almost anything.

In fact, 20 percent of your staff and colleagues probably give you 80 percent of all the support you need. Don't take them for granted, because true advocates like them are rare. You probably read trade journals and books, and I'll bet 20 percent of them supply 80 percent of your knowledge in those subjects.

And what about those jobs around the house that you've been meaning to get around to doing? The 80/20 Rule means that if you have a list of ten items to do, two of those items will turn out to be worth as much or more than the other eight items put together.

The 80/20 Rule can be harnessed in many ways for your business. And when I say 80/20, that's really an approximation. Sometimes it might be 70/30, sometimes 85/15, you get the idea. The crux of the concept is that a small percentage of something is responsible for the vast majority of the results.

Even how you spend your time is subject to the 80/20 Rule. Ever notice that 20 percent of your efforts is responsible for 80 percent of your success? And the reverse is also true: 80 percent of your efforts is only responsible for 20 percent of your success.

Look familiar?

You're in the 80% (the less desirable) segment of your efforts if...

- You're working on tasks that aren't in your area of expertise.
- You're spending time on tasks other people want you to do, but you get little or nothing in return.
- You're doing a lot of prep work that's setting you up for the "real" work
- Tasks are taking much longer than you thought they would.
- You're frequently putting out fires and working on "urgent" tasks.
- You're not happy, you're complaining, or you don't feel a sense of accomplishment upon completion of your tasks.

However, you're in the 20% (the more desirable) segment of your efforts if...

- You're outsourcing or hiring people to do the tasks outside your area of expertise or ones you prefer not to do.
- You're engaged in activities that help to advance your purpose and achieve your goals.
- You're knocking out tasks quickly, especially the "core" work that needs to be done
- You're doing things you enjoy and feel good about.
- You may be working on tasks you don't like, but you're doing them knowing they contribute to the bigger picture.
- You're happy, smiling, and you feel a deep sense of accomplishment upon completion of your tasks

So how does the 80/20 Rule apply to the marketing funnel? And what is this funnel anyway?

First, the 80/20 Rule: Eighty percent of your income is determined by 20 percent of your customers. If that's not the case, then you are likely missing out on a lot of profitable opportunities. Let me explain.

If your customers contribute to your profits on a one-to-one ratio (1:1), then that means your business model is set up so that once a customer buys from you, you never sell to them again. One opportunity. One sale. End of story. Find the next customer.

But if you continue to sell to them again and again, you'll ultimately discover that there are certain customers who will buy more often and spend more money with you over the long haul than others. Some will still buy once, and you'll never hear from them again. That's fine. It's going to happen no matter what system you have in place.

But your system will play a major role in determining what those top "20 percenters" will ultimately spend with you, and whether you have a top 20 percent to begin with.

These folks ("20 percenters") are your "A" clients, your "A" customers. They're the ones you want to treat like royalty. Just like the 20 percent of your staff and colleagues who are true advocates for you, your "A" customers are true advocates for your company. And they show their loyalty by purchasing from you, being repeat customers and by referring your business to others.

So the system you want to employ should have a built-in bias towards encouraging your customers to:

- Make bigger purchases with cross-sells and up-sells.
- Purchase more often.
- Graduate towards making bigger ticket purchases -- those that bring you greater profits.
- Become an advocate for your business and refer others to you.

The system should also provide a strong incentive, an "ethical bribe" if you will, for the people in your target market (i.e. your prospects) to become your leads, willingly and voluntarily.

What Is The Marketing Funnel?

Large corporations often use what's called the "open house," or brand-building, model of advertising, which is expensive, time-consuming, and requires a lot of brand equity and trust over time before people make decisions to buy from them.

With the "marketing funnel" model, a person makes a small purchase (yes, supplying an email or physical mailing address is considered a payment of sorts), and over time you "funnel" your customers towards more and more high-end products and services, step by step, by selling them to the next level.

The two are entirely different business models, and they both work in their own ways. For most entrepreneurs, however, the brand-building model is too cost-prohibitive and time-consuming to use by itself, involving many resources that simply aren't practical. That doesn't mean you shouldn't use it within your means. In fact, you'll soon see how to incorporate both the open house and marketing funnel models in your system (for starters...we're just getting warmed up!).

So by "funneling" (also called "back-ending" or "up-selling"—online marketing guru, Dan Kennedy, calls it "gathering the herd") your prospects into paying customers, you're setting the stage to provide tremendous value to them. So much value, in fact, that your customers begin to look forward to receiving information from you. And with that value comes the opportunity to take your customer to the next level, where you can sell higher-end goods to them.

And this isn't a one-sided benefit. Both you and your customer benefit by this relationship. Your customer benefits when he gets even more value – something he really wants. You're helping him in that regard. You, of course benefit as well by slowly graduating your customer to your "A" list, where you can provide even more value.

I once knew a salesman from a large workforce management company. This company sold expensive computer systems that helped call centers forecast their incoming call volume, determine how many customer service people they needed to handle those calls, and even generate the most efficient schedules for those reps in order to maintain a desired level of service.

This guy was an old pro when it came to managing his leads. When a potential client company would issue a request for proposal to him (basically an opportunity for his company to provide a quote based on the issuing company's needs), he would keep track of all the people involved in the decision-making process, plus any supporting personnel. Basically anyone's info he could get his hands on.

Now when he learned that a key person moved from one company to another (which was fairly common), and that new company was in the market for his product, he would personally contact his "lead" from the old company (now working for the new one) and continue his funneling efforts there, while still maintaining the funnel at the old company.

Now imagine he was doing this for all of his leads, wherever they ended up. He had funnels in place everywhere. Do you think he had trouble meeting his financial obligations?

Personally I think every sale he made was well earned. Anyone who can keep track of all those funnels and people moving to different companies deserves to earn a profit.

Figures 2-1 and 2-2 in the following pages show the typical marketing funnel. Figure 2-1 shows an offline version of the funnel model, and figure 2-2 shows the online equivalent. Note that the only differences are at the top of the funnel, signifying the manner in which you obtain your leads. Online they visit your website before they supply their information and become a lead. In the offline world, they would receive your offer in some other manner.

A truer scenario might represent your target market as prospects, who become prospects only after raising their hands (i.e. they become your prospects when they become your leads), but however you view them, the goal is to obtain leads and then attempt to convert them into paying customers.

Notice how the width of the funnel gets smaller towards the bottom? The width represents the number of customers at that height, or stage, of the funnel. However, the smaller the width, the more money they are spending with you. In fact, the amount of money they spend with you can be thought of as being inversely proportionate to the width of the funnel (more or less). So the 20 percent responsible for 80 percent of your profits are at the bottom of the funnel. The other 80 percent that give you 20 percent of your profits are towards the top. This distribution is a general observation and not a mathematical absolute. As I mentioned earlier, it might be 70/30 or 90/10 or somewhere in between.

This is no accident. Your “A” customers, your biggest advocates, are in the smallest segment of your customer base...the bottom of the funnel (but at the top in terms of the value you deliver to them).

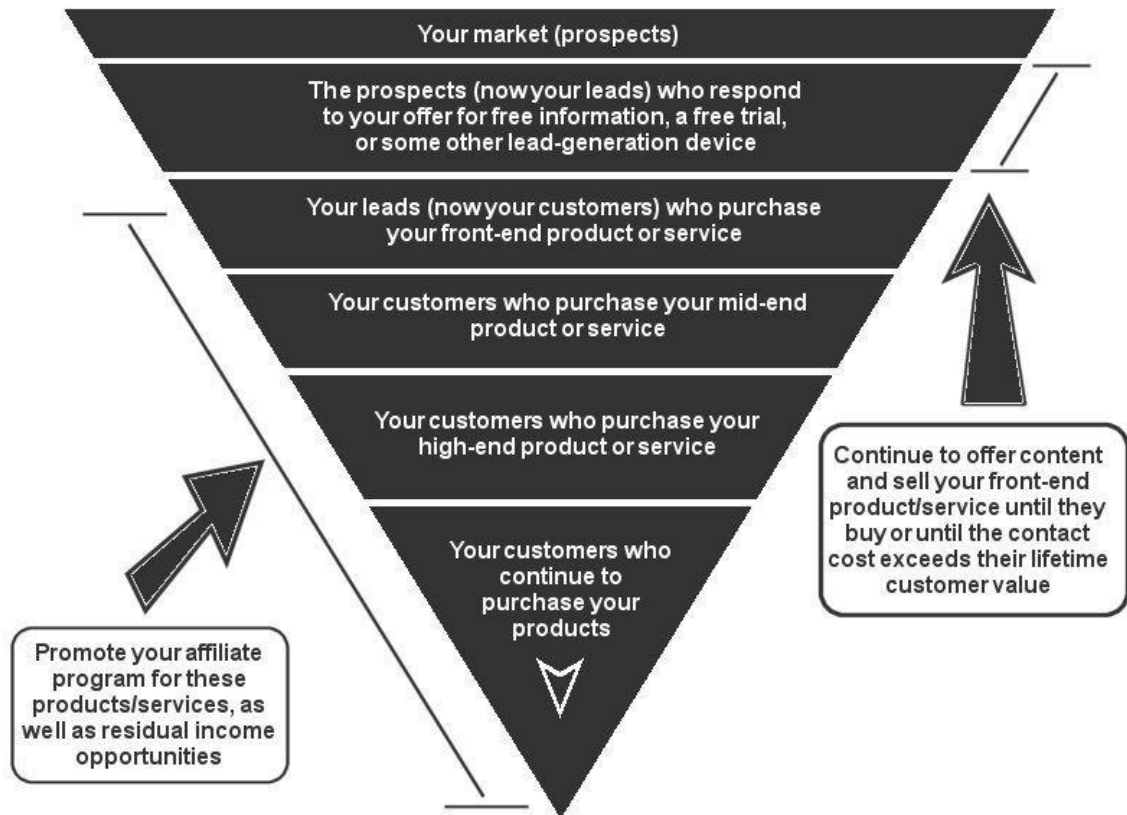

Figure 2-1
 The Marketing Funnel (Offline)

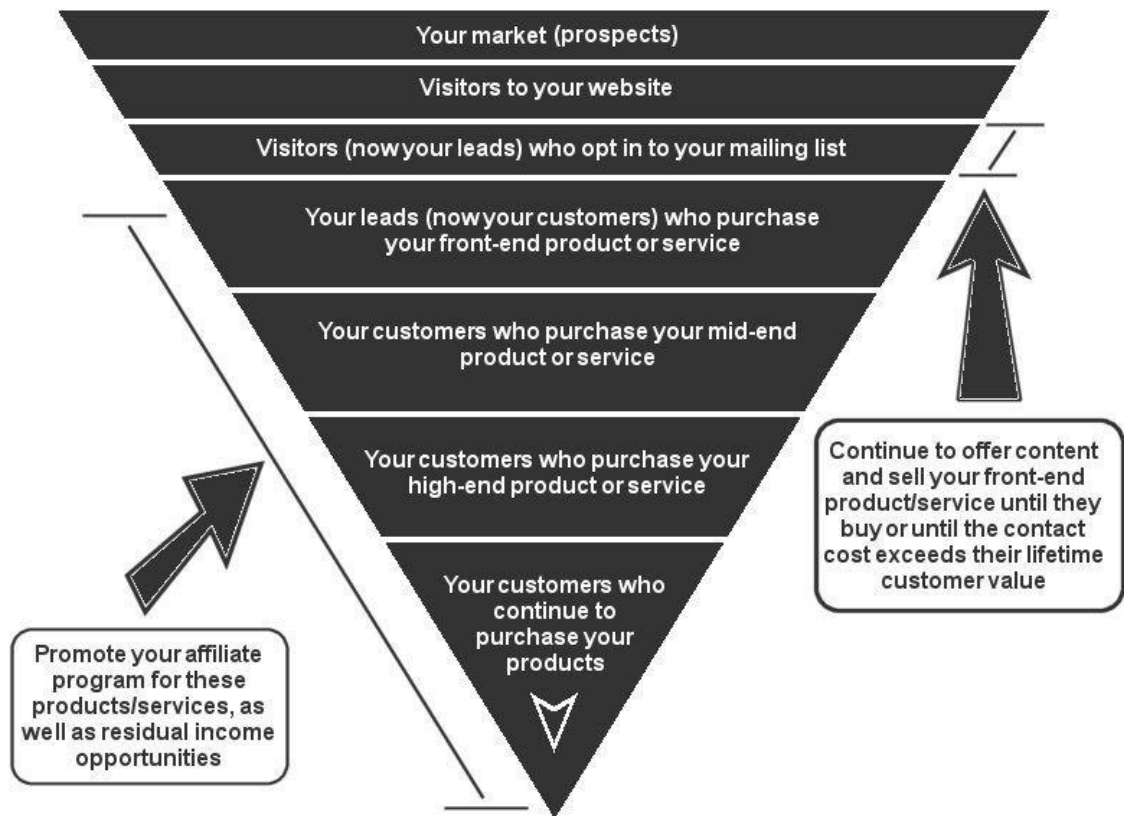

Figure 2-2
 The Marketing Funnel (Online)

Let's walk through each step of the funnel to gain a clearer understanding of how the funnel works.

1. Your prospect enters the funnel by responding to your incentive or “ethical bribe” and give you their contact information. So now they are a lead on your mailing list.
2. You continue to provide value to the prospect but you want him or her to make the transition from a non-paying lead to a paying customer. As a result, you give the prospect a front-end, or entry-level, offer on a product or service directly related to the value he or she received when opting to join your list. You may make the offer at a breakeven or even an initial loss, because you know you will more than make up for it on back-end sales.

3. If the prospect doesn't purchase your front-end product, you continue to sell them on the same offer or different front-end offers—ideally both, because he or she just may not be in the market for your initial offer at this time, but may be later.
4. When the prospect purchases your front-end product, he or she is now a customer. You are now “warming him up” to doing further business with your company. Once the prospect sees that you over-deliver on your promise of value, they'll feel more comfortable buying from you again.
5. You want to graduate the prospect to the next price level, so you make an offer on a higher-end product or service related to the entry-level one they already bought. If he or she doesn't buy, you follow a similar approach as step 3 above. That is, you continue to make offers, but this time on the mid-level product.
6. Once the prospect purchases your mid-level product, you move onto the high-end product. The prospect is now conditioned to buy from you with confidence and without worry, because he or she knows what an outstanding value you've been providing. Because the prospect has seen the results of your products first hand, their buyer's resistance is reduced. The prospect is now on the way to becoming one of your “A” clients, the 20 percent responsible for 80 percent of your profits.
7. You continue to sell the prospect higher ticket items and provide them with even greater value.

The steps I have listed are very simplified. You'll soon see that there is much more to it if you truly want to be successful in the long run, but it's not rocket science by any means.

You also want to develop some kind of residual income, where clients pay you so much per month or per year for an agreed length of time or until service is canceled. Not everyone will do that, of course, but your “A” customers probably will. And you can create different residual levels, just like you have different product levels, all at different price points.

Get Referrals

After a customer buys your product or service, you'll want to ask them for referrals and/or a testimonial, and do everything in your power to make sure they are satisfied. You want your customer to be satisfied so they'll become repeat customers of course, but you also want to reduce your refund rate and gain the customer's confidence and endorsement. You want them to tell all their friends and colleagues about their positive experience with your company.

You probably know that when someone has a bad experience with a company they're more likely to tell others about it than when they have a pleasant experience. You want to encourage clients to tell all about their pleasant experience with you.

Final Words

This report only illustrates the types of transactions you should be thinking about for your business. In the long run, you're going to need a plan that will sustain your business for a longer stretch of time, rather than a week-to-week, month-to-month approach. That's the real secret to building a long-term business for success.

Exercises like asking yourself where you'd like to see your business in two, five or 10 years from now can really make a difference in whether your business will be a short-term overnight success that will fizzle quickly, or whether it will sustain the test of time and provide a lifetime value for you and your family.

Ideally, you want to plan for the latter. This report has barely scratched the surface. But it does give you something to think about and plan toward. Don't just focus on the short term but rather look at the bigger picture and all the positive possibilities for growth that will last you a lifetime.

Here is to your success in multi-platform business operations!

Author's Bio

Christiana Augustine is the owner/CEO of Augustine Business Solutions which specializes in helping small businesses build successful online presence. She has been working in the Computer industry as a Programmer and Systems Analyst since 1985 and has been creating profitable web sites and web-based strategies since 2004. Her background also includes extensive experience in Microsoft Office suite applications, computer training and working with various computer software applications, with strong organizational and project management skills. Call her today to discuss how Augustine Business Solutions can use web-based strategies to help your business grow and increase your profits.

◆ Christiana Augustine